While carrying out these fairly unique responsibilities, we remain fully engaged in consummating our proposed merger. We are currently in Phase II of the European Commission's regulatory review process, and as is normally the procedure, we would expect to be receiving their case team's formal "statement of objections" soon. We will, of course, continue to provide regular updates and you can be sure you will hear from us when we have more to report on that front. I know there is a lot of noise in the media right now, much of it driven by our competitors, but let me assure you that we are at precisely the point where I thought we would be when the deal was first announced back in February. In fact, we are making a lot of progress in other key areas of the merger. This month, we welcomed the approval by the German Federal Financial Supervisory Authority (BaFin) for our merger. Also, the integration workstreams are making tremendous progress, and last week the new executive committee held our first of several regular meetings that will take place over the course of the fall. We had a good, substantive discussion, and we all remain extremely enthused by what our two companies can achieve together.

At the same time, the markets seem to have ideas of their own. As I mentioned last month, the macro-economic situation in the EU and the US as well as speculation around the merger approval process have weighed heavily on us. The recent talk of a Financial Transaction Tax in the EU has only added fuel to the fire. Larry and I met with 15-20 investors on Friday last week, and almost all of their questions were focused on assessing the global economy, the likelihood of the FTT being applied and the merger process. Few, if any, of the questions were about whether we were delivering what we said we would. Given all of this, I couldn't help but share Dan Ackerson's view that he expressed a few days ago. Dan, the CEO of General Motors, said he was proud of his company's performance but disappointed by the stock price.
