Japanese Economy and Stock Market Outlook

The OTC Index declined by 14.8%, in ended August 31, 2001, amid disappointing corporate news from both the U.S. and Jap and the poor domestic economic trends in Japan.

In addition to signs of economic retrenchment, growing disillusionment wit the policy inertia from the ruling Libera Democratic Party ("LDP") compounded the depressed market sentiment until mid-Marc However, the Japanese OTC stock market to weigh heavily on the market throughout August. Although both the BOJ and the Fed Reserve Bank took further action to ease monetary policy that monetary policy, these policy measures appeared to have little impact on either U.S. or the Japanese equity markets. The Index declined below the 1,200 level in 1 August, for the first time since January.

In late April and early May, the Japanese OTC stock market extended its recovery in anticipation of structural reforms based on the policies outlined by new Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi and his cabinet. However, cautious sentiment returned due to the delay in clarifying the new government's intended policy measures. In mid-June, the cabinet released a draft policy document that included measures to expedite the disposal of banks' non-performing loans, the promotion of deregulation by stimulating competitiveness in the private sector, and measures to alleviate the impact of the structural reform program while stimulating economic activity. Nevertheless, the Japanese equity market seemed to be waiting to assess the full substance of the proposed reforms the full substance of the proposed reforms, given the likelihood that they would have a negative near-term impact on the Japanese economy.

In July, the BOJ's Tankan survey and the June Industrial Production figures highlighted the continuing deterioration in domestic fundamentals. In addition, a continuous stream of corporate profit warnings and the absence of further clarification of Japan's structural reform may intensify as a result of Prime Minist plans at the G8 Summit, also dampened Koizumi's structural reforms, any recover plans at the G8 Summit, also dampened Koizumi's strusentiment in the market. Meanwhile, the LDP-led governing coalition party won Japan's very gradual. plans at the G8 Summit, also dampened Upper House election by a clear margin on July 29, 2001, but the result had relatively little impact on the market.

a bid to maintain the administration's credibility. However, this raises the possibility that bond issuance may exceed the pledged limit. The stock market's sensitivity to a new program of fiscal expansion has intensified the upward risk to long-term interest rates toward the year-end.

Under these conditions, the Yen to one U.S. dollar exchange rate is expected to remain in a narrow range close to the 120 Yen level for some time due to opposite and competing influences. The weak state of the Japanese economy and base money growth will tend to weigh upon the Yen, while mounting pressure by the Bush Administration to retreat from a strong dollar policy will put upward pressure on the Yen.

During the quarter ended June 30, 20 Japan's real Gross Domestic Product ("GDP decreased by 3.2% (annualized) from the previous quarter. Although private consumption increased slightly, housing investment, capital spending and exports declined sharply. Public works spending a declined as the effect of last autumn's economic stimulus package dissipated. There are even signs that some technology stocks, especially among the electronic component makers, have started bottom out, although the pace of recovery will depend on the strength of demand for final products, such as personal computer ("PCs") and cell phones. .... this trend is that some stocks now look relatively attractive considering that current price to book ratios are decreasi to historically low levels, but offer groups to material every the medium term potential over the medium term.

and declining exports, Japan's macro-economic fundamentals will offer little support to the OTC stock market for the time being. However, the stock market's downside will be limited as inexpensive valuations and the BOJ's quantitative easing policy lend support.

The Japanese OTC stock market valuations are now at approximately 17 times forecasted earnings, which is close to the historical low recorded in 1998. There is still scope for a downward revision to corporate earnings for this fiscal year given the depressed economic conditions. However, the Japanese OTC stock market does offer attractive value over the longer term even after discounting expected earnings downgrades.

Until the electronics industry and the broader economy demonstrate signs of recovery, we expect defensive stocks, with inexpensive valuations and stable earnings, to outpace the market for now as they attract liquidity from leading companies with poor earnings momentum.

80% of its peak, based on views that the worst point for the Japanese economy may over soon. Therefore, we will not significantly raise our exposure to this segment from current levels. Rather, we we cautiously seek opportunities to increase exposure to technology stocks and cyclical issues.

In closing, we share the concerns of our shareholders with the terrorist actions on September 11, 2001 and we extend our sympathy to the families of all of the victims. We will continue to monitor world development and to exercise caution in our management of the Fund.

We appreciate your continuing suppor your Fund.

Sincerely,

Kazuhiko Hama President
